Excerpt: . . . real estate: an unromantic story Chapter I then climate (says Emerson) is a great impediment to idle persons. Neither Mrs. Smithson nor Caroline Mathers had crossed the doorstep since Friday morning. It was now Monday afternoon, and three days of unceasing rain had made their situation pretty nearly intolerable. If you have a grudge against anyone they can do nothing right--just as, when in sympathy with them, it is difficult to believe they can be in the wrong. Mrs. Smithson sitting cubelike in an easychair beside a small coal fire, looked across at Miss Mathers, her dire companion, indignant because she was silent, although half an hour ago she had been indignant at her for chattering. Miss Mathers, on the cold side of the room, aware of a draught at the back of her neck, kept looking steadfastly at the bit of work--a piece of Irish crochet--with which her...
