The behavior of pedestrian is essential before providing such facilities. It is, as a study in Kathmandu, problems regarding behavioral aspects of pedestrians are formulated using a mathematical model. Data were collected adopting observational and interview method at mid-block un-controlled crossings from eight locations in Kathmandu. Randomly selected 400 pedestrians were observed for their waiting time and he/she was asked with a set of questions including their behavior and societal parameters. Likelihood ratios was used to signify the variables to calibrate Cox Proportional Hazards Model . The research was concluded with two set of predictors.
