Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****.Excerpt from Encyclopaedia Medica, Vol. 7 Since then it has been and still is, more or less, prevalent all over Europe and in North America and Australia; to a less extent also in certain districts of South America, South Africa, India, and China. Etiology. At the present day, therefore, diphtheria is a very widely spread affection. The accumulation of properly compiled records of the fatal cases in various countries during the past twenty-five to fifty years has enabled inquirers to elucidate several important facts with respect to its etiology. Amongst the most recent and valuable researches in this field are those of Newsholme. This author draws conclusions, of which the following is a brief summary: Diphtheria has a tendency to spread from one place to another by the ordinary channels of communication. In certain years diphtheria may be pandemic over whole countries or a continent. The amount of endemic diphtheria varies greatly for different countries and cities; but in no town from which records have been obtained is there a complete absence of the disease in a single year since the records commenced. In places where the amount of endemic diphtheria is not great, epidemics tend to occur in cycles, the intervals between the cycles being very variable for different places. The duration of an epidemic is also variable, but is usually longer in large than in small cities or towns. Before the appearance of Newsholme's work it had been shown that for England and Wales one of the most striking features with respect to the prevalence of diphtheria was that, whereas up to 1880 the disease was incident upon the rural to a greater extent than upon the urban population, since...
