Excerpt from Astho Bilingual Health Initiative Report and Recommendations: State Health Agency Strategies to Develop Linguistically Relevant Public Health Systems; July 1992 In 1984, the Secretary's Task Force on Black and Minority Health initiated the first comprehensive analysis by the Department of Health and Human Services of the disparity in deaths and illnesses experienced by racial and ethnic minority populations in the United States. Since that time, a concerted effort at the federal, state, local, and community levels has been undertaken to address the needs of minority populations in order to increase access to health services and to decrease health disparities. In 1990 the Department of Health and Human Services issued its report, Healthy People 2000: National Health Promotion and Disease Prevention Objectives, listing over 100 objectives targeting the needs of growing racial and ethnic minority populations. The Healthy People report has become a partial blueprint for planning and policy development at the state and national level, as states have developed their own priority objectives and strategized ways to improve the health of state residents. Lack of standardized data obscures health disparities and the effect of cultural and linguistic barriers to health care for ethnic groups such as Hispanics, Asians and Pacific Islanders, Native Americans, Alaskan Natives, and Caribbean Islanders. Although race-specific data has been compiled on health indicators for whites and blacks, little standardized data is available on individual ethnic populations. Lack of data is often attributed to the small size of ethnic and racial populations, and to the difficulty in designing appropriate health status and health needs assessment instruments. Where information is available, the disproportionately poor health status of refugees, new immigrants, migrant farm workers, and isolated groups of non-english...
