Not illustrated. 1897 Excerpt: .the children could not come because they were without clothing. With the aid of kind friends the want was soon supplied. The children began to trip gaily in, attracted by the novelty and brightness of the new programme, by the appetizing breakfast of milk and hot porridge that awaited them after the long walk, the result being that soon the new class-rooms, built to house more than double the roll-call of previous years, were full to overflowing, and a spacious infant school had to be added. All was working well so far; but--but afterwards? What of those children in whom education must more or less breed a divine discontent with their wretched surroundings? What was their future to be? Providence Factory was started to meet the difficulties suggested by these questions. The factory is a living and robust fact, not a debatable venture, not the morning s winged dream of a strong, too hopeful heart, as so many believed it could but be. The music of machinery now mingles with the voices of the Moy (Mary s river), waking the land from the long night of its lethargy, giving work to willing hands, bringing happiness to the homes of the helpless poor, not merely lifting them from poverty but in many cases saving them from starvation. Visitors to Foxford will see a state of things perhaps unique of its kind in the world. They will see a mill-yard manned by women vowed to poverty and unworldlinessr...
