Excerpt: .gilt, and the surface of both sides and gabled top are reticulated with square panels set diamondwisc. They contain armorial bearings; alternately the imperial eagle displayed, and a demi eagle impaled with two bends, being the arms of the city of Niirnburg (?). The chasse is placed on an altar tomb, the ends and sides of which are recessed in panels filled with sculptured basreliefs and the four angles supported by detached pillars; it stands on a base. The whole is enclosed in a shrine or chapel, with a roof elaborately ornamented with architectural groinings, and surmounted by three richly composed canopies, which rise with great multiplication of parts, such as niches, arches, c. The centre canopy is surmounted by an image of the Infant Saviour holding an orb in His left hand. The roof is supported on three side and two end arches, which rest on square piers connected by arches at the base, and standing on a square slab or plinth, which is carried on the backs of snails in their shells. The shrine is of bronze cast and chased, and the whole elaborately decorated with figures of different scale. It can be taken in detail. The piers are square, with small round shafts at the angles. They rest on bases having niches filled with grotesque figures on three sides. The bases are connected with each other by round arched braces richly decorated, which form a small arcade round the structure. Two-thirds...
